oping alternative technologies, that come with it." And the jobs We should be saying, "We want the federal gov? ernment to put amounts of money 'nto Via Rail; we want to make the rail." I mean, there are industries in Cape Breton that have to do with a sustainable future. If we were able to make enough rails to really have efficient train service for the whole country, instead of de- cidinc -'Ha*. it was going down the tubes, that'a create a lot of jobs. And there are strategies that would create jobs. I think in Cape Breton the best things you can do are to do those things that have something to do with the skills of people in the area, and things that people are used to, and that are creating as many jobs as possible. Things that are labour-intensive instead of capital- intensive. If we were using more people in the woods.... They found in the northwest coast of the United States, the Forest Service there is now using sheep and people instead of herbi? cides, because they say it does a much better job and it's cheaper. So, there's a lot that we could do that would be better for the economy. I mean, they're go? ing to be hard choices to make. That's the thing about saving the planet. It's not neces? sarily all easy.... We don't have to do it overnight, but we want to start the transition now. Paul Robinson Celebrates Cape Breton's Magazine In the Atlantic Provinces Book Review: "Back in the early 1970s when I first encountered Cape Breton's Mag? azine my reaction probably went something like this: "it's different, it's interesting in a curious sort of way-and it'll never last...." I looked upon it as a valuable, if temporary, historical resource.... How wrong I was! In the spring of 1989, from their base of operations in Wreck Cove, Cape Breton, publisher and editor, Ron Caplan, and his hand? ful of associates produced their fiftieth issue. For seventeen years what seemed at the outset to be a limited deposit of source material has been expanded and refined to make Cape Breton's Magazine the best local history magazine to be found anywhere."
