man made a fortune that night. He put his price up from ten cents to fifteen cents to get in the tent and he had by then almost every body in Reserve Mines standing there with money in their pockets, and they already got their money's worth in entertainment, Ian was more of a circus than the circus. Yes, he was always good with animals, I always knew that, but I didn't know he was good with people because his chance never came up until the strike. Yes. He was the one who knew what was good for the miners. And he was the one who got them organized. He surprised me and he surprised himself. When he got the men to go out on strike he could hardly believe it. I think what happened, what got him going, was when Neil agreed with him, said he was right at Take Route 22 Out of Sydney to ... For all he argued against Neil, he admired him and thought he was smart, so when Neil gave in it made Ian sure he was right and you could see after that when he talked to the men they were v'dth him. I think that's what Pe'y saw in him. He would do things he didn't want to do, he just made himself do them and that made her brave too to face her father and mother. They didn't even bother to warn her not to go out with him because of religion, everybody knew that was the thing anyway, on both sides, they just told her he was a troublemaker, which of course he was, he certainly made trouble for the company, he got all the men out. It wasn't the president of the union that did it, it was Ian. NeU was amazed with what he was doing. I was too. from CHAPTER SIX • THE PICNIC • FOR A WHILE everything v'dth Ian and NeU was the strike and then one day everything wasn't the strike and Ian got up and started packing a picnic basket and I knew right away the way he was doing it it wasn't for the strike at all.
