the twelve-mile limit by the last of it, as long as you was outside the limit they couldn't touch you. They'd keep you out there too, as long as they could. But those fellas on those government boats, every couple of little (puffs) of wind • little bit of rain--they took off for shore. We fellas followed in behind them and get cleared of liquor. From Scatarie to Smokey Bank, the ships was like that. {George crosses his fin? gers.) In the nighttime you'd swear it was land out there, see, all the lights. You had to put lights up for the traffic. grandfather was a Clark, so they got married that way. My grandmother's mother was a Har? dy. Down in Newfoundland in them days, the story was them Limeys come over, they're Hardys, and they got mixed up with the Indi? ans and they married the Indians. And all the Hardys down there was related, some re? lation of mine. They all called theirselves English, but they were jackie-tars. A jack- ie-tar was a Limey • md an Indian, eh? A half-breed. They went with the Hardy name 'cause it was the man. Most of the women were all Indians on the Hardy side. But on the Lxindrigan side I can only go back as far as my grandmother and grandfather. (How did your parents come to be in Isle- aix-Morts?) It's a French name. Island of the Dead. My parents come there because my grandfather was a Limey, come from England. I lived on an is? land, and we had to row from there to get ashore on the mainland. That's where the schools and the churches and stores were. When I was born, there was only two houses on the island. My grandfather, my father, my oldest brother built a house • that was the third house. Our cousins the Lundri- gans, they built one. That made four hous? es. That's all was on the island.... (How did your father meet your mother?) My father was born on Woods Island. Well, at Corner Brook, a place called Woods Island. At that time it wasn't Corner Brook, it was Bay of Islands, but my father was born there, eh? His people died or something. You Can Pack Everythin Into Our Weekender.
