Agus b'e sin an claidheamh a bh'ann dh'a riribh a's ghabh e amach. O, bha cath aca 'bha neonach agus chuir iad cath a bha oillteil ach mu dheireadh ghe'rr e fear dhe na cinn dhe'n bheist agus sios a ghabh i. Choisich esan suas a dh'ionnsaidh b'rr a* chladaich agus leum e air druim an eich agus co-dhiubh • s e an t-athar a thog e neo'n talamh a shluig e cha robh an cbrt sealladh aice dhe. Ach co-dhiubh, an ceann a ghelirr e bharr na beist', bha e air a chur air gad agus dh'fhagadh sin aice. Dh'l'irich an gaisgeach a bha 'm falach agus thog e rithe suas gu taigh a' righ agus ceann na beisteadh aige air a* ghad agus cha'n the sky as he would travel on the ground, and down he came. He came to a halt be? side her on the shore. The knight leapt down from the saddle and went over to talk with her. He asked her what had brought her here and she told him how things were. "And is there anyone at all," said he, "who will try to save you?" She said that the best warrior in the country was there hiding until the mon? ster came. The knight said he would stay to help her • to save her • and that he wbuld go between her and the monster. "O," she said, "you can't remain here. If the monster sees you here it will never come." "Then I will stretch myself out," said he, "on the shore beside you where it won't see rae and I'll lay my head on your knee. And if I fall asleep before the monster emerges ??ind you fail to waken me by trying one thing after another, put this curved stick into my nostril and that will waken me." After a length of time, wh'en the knight was in a long slumber, the three-headed monster arrived. It came up, looking very ugly, and she began trying to wake up the knight, but though she called to him and shook him he would not awake. But she STORY CONTINUED ON NEXT PAGE
