Dh'inns' i mar a thachair agus thuir e nach fhaigheadh i cothram ma dh'fhaoidte air 'fhaighinn ach air aon dbigh, nan oibrichea'h sin?? a dh'fhaighinn a h-uile seorsa flur bu bhriagha 's a b'eireach? dail a b'urrainn dhi fhaotainn, agus tha mi cinnteach seudan eile c5mhla ris a' sin, agus an toir' sios a dh'ionnsaidh a* chladaich agus an sgaoileadh 'nan sreathan gu h-'rd air an traigh' Agus 'nuair a thigeadh a' bheist an airde 's i ag iarraidh pairt dhe'n eireachdas a bha 'sin, a chantail rith' gu faodadh i 'm faighinn uile nan sealladh i dhi-se na bha os cionn a* chrios neo os cionn na cruachainnidh aig a companach. Agus ma dh'fhaoidte, thuir esan, gu rachadh aige fh'in air tighinn as a' sin. Seo an rud a rinn i. Bha i shios air a' chladach a' cur nam fluran 's nan nithean a bha 'seo ann an Brdugh agus th'"inig a' bheist anuas gu iomall na traghad a'us dh'fhoighneachd i an tugadh i dhi pairt dhe na fluran agus dhe'n eireachdas 'bha 'sin. O, thuir i gu'n tugadh i dhi uil' iad nan sealladh i dhi na bha os cionn na cruachainn a companach agus 'nuair a rinn closest to the shore, and the monster swallowed him and took him away. And maybe, he said, he would be able to escape from there. That is what she did. She was down on the shore putting the flowers and the other things in order and the monster came up to the edge of the beach and asked her whether she would give it part of the flowers and the finery that was there. O, she said she would give it all of them if it would show her what was above the hip of its companion. And when it did that, Iain managed to reach land. All that the monster could do was to take or leave the things.
