round the country that agreed with this counting fence • And the Department of Fish? eries made awful blunders. There was an old fellow, his name was Buckles, down here where they had the fish pond at the harbour. They caught salmon there for breeding stock. They had a retaining pond they kept the salmon in. And Buckles was a great fellow, used to give a lot of his? tory about the fellows who worked there, jobs would be scarce then and they'd be conniving every year how they were going to get a job there. He owned the land and he was hired on--had a kind of first chance to get a job there. And he said they had a trap in right below the fish pond. And they were catching that fall an awful run of large salmon. And they filled his retaining pond. And one warm day--they were still putting salmon in--and one day he told me that they looked out over the pool and the salmon's tails were sticking out of the water, about half of the sal? mon's tail was sticking out, all over the pool. And Buckles told the head guy, "You're going to lose an awful lot of sal? mon; there's something wrong." "Oh," he said, "that won't hurt--we'll catch a few more." They were still putting them in. The next day it was Buckles' job to bury the dead salmon that came out of that pool. He said, "I buried 66 of the beautifulest salmon you ever saw in your life." Well now, if you're going to waste salmon like that on the river, how is the river ever going to survive? And Buckles had seen that happen before. That's the way the Fisheries used the river. So I have no ill feeling about poaching, when things like that will go on. And that was marked "le? gal." Three salmon spearheads owned by Elwood Hart.
