sion or whatever it might have been would move rapidly away, disappear under the water for some time and then reappear. Now that is all I saw. -If that satisfies you as conclusive evidence to establish the existence of a sea serpent you are welcome to my contribution. There was a party of us on the verandah of the hotel watching the performance. A sea captain gave his evidence as follows: "Certainly it is a sea serpent. I saw one off Margaree about fifteen years ago. We were at anchor and another schooner was in the stream a little way off. The sea serpent came along at a great speed and passed right between the two vessels. There was a French fishing smack anchored between the two schooners and the great serpent seemed to be making straight for the smack. All hands on the smack raced below and pulled the scuttle over, but the serpent never changed his course. When he came to the smack he made a clean dive under and came up on the other side. The serpent was about seventy-five feet long, others judged it to be, a hundred, but I don't think it was over seventy-five. It was swimming on the top of the water with its head up and made a great swish in the sea as it went by," Then a fisherman gave his testimony. He said: "It's a sea serpent all right. One: higher labour, energy and transportation costs are taking bigger slices of the revenue pie. Two: pulp and paper mills are being built, expanded and modernized all over the world, often with built-in advantages such as low-cost wood or nearness to markets. Competition everywhere is increasing and creating new challenges in Canada's traditional markets. Governments, industry and labour all have an interest in seeing that Canada's pulp and paper production enjoy brisk sales. To keep Canada competitive in the world markets for pulp and paper - where 80% of our sales are made - policies which affect costs must be developed with the larger picture in focus. One time we run up to one off the bite of Smoky and he turned and snapped at the boat and took a clean bite out of a big spruce oar. Yes, there's sea serpents all right, the fishermen have often chased them around the bay." Now, will you doubt the existence of the sea serpent? Do I? Quien sabe; I decline further discussion. When I sit down in the middle of a good old fashioned orthodox Presbyterian congregation and listen to a positive and able reasoner tackle the doctrine of foreordination I become convinced that the preacher is right, but, when I get loose and get out into the open I defy the theological straight jacket. The above was written some time between the mellow twilight of Saturday night and the purpling haze of Sunday morning--the hour is not important. Sunday came with the fierce blaze of a July sun in an unclouded sky, which made men, dogs and all other wild animals hunt for the cool spots. So the day passed away in idleness or the seclusion of a story. About four o'clock the population began to crawl out, and from easy chairs on the sandy side, with the lightest drift of cooling air, we revelled in the glories of the seaside. Suddenly, far out in the bay there appeared a ripple, and presently at the end of the ripple appeared the black head of the sea serpent. Everybody came to attention and glasses were levelled at the great leviathan that, like the grand conception of Milton, lay prone along the flood. "Let us get after the brute!" This from the young landlord, and the sparkle of his eye showed that he meant business. Promptly a knight of the grip and a sergeant of the quill volunteered for service. Then there was hurrying to and fro. Every available boat was missing; the owner of an old fishing dory was hailed across the creek
