Rory MacKinnon CONTINUED from inside front cover the floor stuck to the earth and he couldn't move. He was there for about a week, hollerin' and screechin' and every? body in town was that scared they wouldn't dare come out of the doors of the house. Well, he went down where he was at. "Hello, devil," he says. "Hello," the devil says. "What do you took me (for), keeping me here." "Oh, I'm keeping you there," he says. "You've got to give me another year before I let you clear," he says, "Sure," he says, "I'll give you another year. Let me out of here." He says, "Go ahead." He went through the roof. Took half the roof with him. And every time after that when they'd fix the hole when the night come (in the) morning (it would be) open the same as ever. Could never close up the hole. Aw, mister, old Jack, he was going around here and there and another year came to an end. "Well," he said, "look mister"--he was in the store he had--"come on with me today. You're not going to trick me today like you tricked me the other day." "Aw, no, I wouldn't trick you at all," he said, "but come on with me to home," he said. "I've got to put on me clothes so I can go with you." "All right," he said, "I'll go with you." He says, "Sit down on that chair." He sat down on the chair. The chair stuck to the floor and the floor stuck to the earth and here he was and he couldn't move. Not a stir. "You comin' now?" Not a smoke. he told the old devil. "I can't get out of here." They all left the house, left him there screechin' and hollerin' and like his tongue was out about a foot from hollerin' No getting clear. But old Jack come in. "Well," Jack told him, "give me another year," he says, "and I'll let you clear." "Go ahead," he said. He made one jump and through the loft and through the roof he went to a nice house. And they closed the hole in the day and the night would close
