lot of cases, only that his overall style did something to a tune, that could be played by anybody else, wouldn't sound the same as the way he'd do it. Whether it'd be in his phrasing, or the lift or lilt. Wins? ton's music, to me, always sounded aggressive, or cocky. With the technical ability, under any influence, to show nothing but mastermanship. And his music sounded that way, to me. Like, there was extreme confidence, and couldn't do wrong. That's the way it sounded to me, and that's the way-- to me--it was projected. His music always sounded completely confident. And, as well, " , /" challenging. A challenge that I maybe choose to maybe never be able to meet. Not out of choice, I guess. But there's only one Winston Fitzgerald. As there's only one Bill Lamey or one Angus Chisholm. I guess in a way you could say Winston, acknowledging that it was his style that I went after, also allowed me to look at taking the best from what everybody or all fiddlers had to offer. As my father originally spoke of, and that I never took heed to, until I'd maybe actually seen it through my own eyes. (It's interesting--fathers--what are we going to do with them?) Really, really. The older you get, the smarter they get! Right?
