Four. And the next teacher--all the records were there, you know, in the queer thing--the big book, they call them. And Five and Six, one year. Well, I went to Grade Eleven--5 more years. I was through school in June; I wouldn't be 13 until January. Grade 11. In '25, when the steel company was on strike, and they had the military in, I used to walk from the Sydney Academy after writing my exam, over to One Gate to listen to them playing music. They had a big band, the military. Lot of stealing going on, and rimracking the steel plant. That's why they brought the militia in. The militia had to go all through the plant. Guys sneaking in, getting in under fences, and destroying, see. So, he said, "Charlie, when you're through school in June, you're going to get a truck. I have it. I'll bring it out from Sydney--a good Ford truck. Get you a job on the highway, driving on the highway, up at Grand Mira." So, he gave me a letter to take up to the councillor, and the councillor said, "Go right to work." That same councillor, in November when the highway was through for the winter, "Here. Take that letter up to British Metals. Go to work up there, sir." And then, when British Metals went broke the following June, the same councillor Gillis, "Here. Go to Big Pond, Charlie, and go to work." That's how I got on the road. (That's been the only work you've ever done.) Ever done, was drive, drive, drive. The only work I ever done. Oh, I did a little woods work. There was one or two winters we cut pit timber for a couple of months. Then have to haul it to the S & L Railroad and ship it by car. And wait. Well, instead of them paying me--I'd be out on the road in the truck in the summer-- (instead of) paying me for last winter's wages in the woods, they'd pay it to Mum. (But most of your life was on the road there.) On the road. On the wheel. (When you were small, did you ever have any other idea of what you wanted to do with your life? Did you ever have any other plan?) Not that I can run across, long as I could get--I'd steal a car or a truck to drive it. And not meaning nothing, too, that I stole it, but just to drive it. See, T started so young. And I liked it. As long as I was behind the wheel, whether I got paid or not, I was driving. (Were you interested as well in how cars work, or did you just want to drive them?) Oh, I was learning how to--I'd watch them fixing them and everything. And by God, I

BOE 2W0 (902)787-2274 A few years ago, drinking was part of a good time, but too many "good times" ended in tragedy. Today drinking and driving is socially unacceptable and tough laws are in place to enable police to detect and stop drinking drivers. If alcohol makes up part of your celebrations • Select a designated driver who doesn't drink to get the rest of the group home safely. Take a cab or other public transportation. Arrange to stay over until you've sobered up. As a host, make food, non-alcoholic drinks and activities the highlights of the party, if you do offer a bar, shut it down at least an hour before guests plan to leave. Provide accommodations, or a drive home for guests who've "had too much". And, never offer anyone "one for the road". Don't risk your life • and those you love - for a good time*!
