Point). And they were looking for (someone)-- they were people that were working out there--some of the men that I knew-- neighbours of ours. And he said they were looking for a helper, to help the Su? per's wife. And they were paying good money. So I went out to help. So I fared off cooking for the men. I stayed there till down in Novem? ber. I went out the last of May and I stayed till down in November. (Tell me about Jimmy Curtis. Where did you meet him?) On St. Paul's Island. He was one of the boatsmen there for awhile. He was (with) the life-saving (crew). There was the supply boat would come from Hali? fax and they'd bring the supplies for the island. And she'd anchor off, and those men would get in the boats and row out and get the supplies. Rose Burton. Helen's daughter: But St. Paul's was all just.... Helen: Bare bold cliff, you know. No shoreline, or no beach or anything that you could (land at). Nothing but just bare cliff and rock. It's perpendicular--the water right into the (cliff face). You know, like you see wa? ter- -it's always angry. Now there'd be times it'd be lovely there. And over on the oth? er side, that would be a livid storm. And the northeast, well, they'd have the fog alarm, and the lighthouse, it was the same way. You'd have to go in a boat to get to the northeast light. They had a bosun's chair across (The Tittle)--I think it's about 80 feet of a drop, and a hundred-and-some feet across the channel from one island to the other. The northeast island was separated from the main part. If you were going to the northeast, you'd have to get in this old bosun's (chair). You'd be pulling yourself across on this old cable. It wouldn't scare me.... It might get scary, though, if you looked down. So, there was a man went out there working at the northeast.
