This time when she went to the door, there was a man there. It was her son. Art. She asked him when he had come to Sydney and why he hadn't told her that he was coming for a visit. He did not answer any of her questions; nor did he enter her home. He told her that he had come to say he loved her and to tell her good bye. He turned and walked away and waved to her at the end of the long hallway. She was very puzzled by all of this and went to bed, but had little sleep. The next morning her other son came and told her that he had very bad news for her. Before he could say anything, she said that she already knew what it was-- her son Art was dead. Her other son was mystified and asked her how she knew, and she said that Art had come to say good bye to her the night before. In fact they later found out that Art had come at the very same time that he was pronounced dead. This is a true story. It was a small grey house that my grandmother and her sisters and brothers lived in. During a heavy rainstorm in the autumn, everyone went to bed because there was really nothing else to do. Just as every? one was going to sleep, my great-aunt thought she heard someone playing the pia? no but she was sure everyone was in bed. So she got up out of her bed and went to her brother, John. John heard the piano too, but he didn't want to get out of bed. Finally, they both went to the room where the piano was. They looked in the room and could see and hear the piano, but they never did see the piano player.

That same piano is now in my grandmother's living-room and some night when everyone is asleep, the piano player could come back. William's Return by Janie Astephen This is a story I know is true because my grandmother told me. It is a story that happened to her grandmother, Katherine.
