Maln-a-Dieu School, Grades III-IV-V, 1955-56 they found a guy on the shore that had drowned. The ship was up in the cove, on its side. And I took a photograph of it--a lovely photograph, dandy photograph. And I shipped it off to the Chronicle-Herald. by taxi. The next day--I wasn't working for the Cape Breton Post then, by the way. The next day...the Cape Breton Post came out, and Vacation in Louisbourg! Front the Old Town to the New fortress Vizw 'staurant! Sort of as a prank, they had their artist paint waves over the ship. And it (was) published in the paper the next day, it was a tremendous shipwreck. I don't know if the paper admitted some years later that that was not a true picture.... So finally, they did admit to me that--you know, we were friends--that that's what happened. That picture is hung up in several homes here in the city. In colour. The real picture's mine. There was no sea breaking over it. It was as calm as anything. It was in the night--the ship wrecked in a storm in the night. There was another shipwreck--the Icelandic XI. Where there's a photograph of the fellow being carried off by helicopter or something. That's my photograph. That was in a storm--it was around Christmas time-- it was really cold. And those who were caught in the ship--you know, they came off, they were frozen. They died there, frozen. And it was run right up on the shore. You could walk on the ship from the shore. (That was the Icelandic II.) Yeah. It ran ashore.
