know. It wasn't something that I thought about while I was in the service. It just didn't exist like that. You might not have got opportunity for promotion as rapidly as somebody who was a white, you know. You weren't getting that consideration, because let's face it: the people who are there already are white, so they're going to pick people who are close to them, and so on and so forth.... Left: Winston and Joyce Ruck on their wedding day. Above, with two of their children, Mariene Iviarie and Joyce Ivlichele, shortly after Black Friday, 1967 England. Practiced in the United States, too. They were the top of the line in the labour movement, the brotherhood. They even had various discriminatory tactics within that. For example, if you were in the railroad and you were, let's say, a fireman. Well, you may go from fireman to driving. But you could never be a conductor. The only body who could be a conductor would be those who were on the footboard. They could go from there to conductor. (Was the steel pick?) Yes. Much the same. They did it very, very covertly. But there were some areas where you knew that they didn't want you. For example, you knew you couldn't get a job in a machine shop, or the Electrical Department. The railroad-- railroad was a very discriminatory department. They had that old system where they believed that they were the elite of the working class. That came from another way. So that was discriminatory. We had to
