ture lingered in Nova Scotia for another thousand years. The Shield Archaic This culture had been first discovered far north in the Canadian Shield. For many years this culture was not mentioned in books, perhaps because instead of a standard type of points, it had many and uncertain ones. In Ottawa it was decided that the more interesting finds from the Narrows was of this culture. At the same time I had noticed that the larger tools from this site were similar to "Beothuk" tools found in Newfoundland. Could this be the people driven away by the Micmacs? At this time, about 400 B.C., a number of strangers landed in South-west Nova Scotia, and this band seems to have come from New England. Some ate clams and others only oysters. The Shield Archaics did not eat either. The other bands made Owascoid pottery, suggesting contact with the Iroquois. The Shield Archaics had no pottery. On the face of a sandy low cliff by the beach was a strip of black. We dug it, and found that it was the grave of a woman. Nothing remained except two teeth. The molar was flat on top, which showed that she had not been eating clams, as the sand in clams scoops out the molars. The incisor had been worn down to the base. This is usual among Eskimo women who must chew the fat out of skins. It seemed possible that all these newcomers had been in contact with the Iroquois and had preferred to be farther away from them. Some had even started an industry- of smoked clams, a practice among tribes in Maine.
