L. H. Chernin Family, 1932. Left to right: L. H. Chernin, his wife Rose, and their children • Myer, Ulendel, Bessie, Joey, Saul, Sadie. when I was thir? teen, we moved downtown into the Cedarvale area, which was close to Forest Hill--and it was kind of a rich Jewish ghetto area. I was quite shocked at the way kids had been brought up. First of all, they didn't seem to know that there weren't only Jew? ish people in the world. Growing up in a ghetto like that they seemed to have a sense that they were all that existed. And I knew that no, no, we were very small, we were a very small portion of a larger population. I knew that from growing up in the Mari? times and from feeling welcome--not feel? ing bad vibes around being Jewish--but al? so knowing that we were different in some way and that we protected ourself in some way. But it was a different experience than what I perceived of the big city Jew? ish kids. They seemed to have an insulari? ty that we didn't have. My mother's best friends were all, you know, the girls who grew up on the street -- Shirley Bannerman, and Elyse Smythe, and so on, and my best friend was Gwennie Munn who lived up the street. (None of them were Jew? ish.) Yeah. I mean, we were all friends with each other and all the relatives and so on, and there was a sense of being Jewish but it wasn't the only thing, you know....
