Clara laughs. They never proved themselves very much because they were up against the Highland Scot! But my father, of course, to his mother, married beneath him. Now I don't know if Grandma Moffatt ever voiced that. No, they liked my father. He was born in Morien.... But when Glace Bay started, they came in in droves from all over the world. The Chinese came in--to do the laundry! And the people from--now, I think of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia--a lot of them then. A lot of them from Poland. A lot of them from Italy. Settled in different areas around. But there was lots of work, because then the steel plant would start after that.

And that's when my husband's family moved up from Newfoundland into Sydney, because of the steel plant. And (his father) worked at the steel plant. Finally, he decided it was not for him, so started a little grocery store. And was doing hard work. He managed to bring up his family and educate them, and all the rest of it. (And he raised....) Four children, and educated them all. I think he started peddling fish, if I'm not mistaken, (with) a little handcart. "Anything," he said, "but the steel plant." He hated the steel plant. And he hated--the unions were coming in, and there was a lot of trouble. There was a lot of ill feeling. People were taking sides. And of course, being Newfoundlanders, they would be pretty low on the (ladder).... They would be in a (class) with the "Hunky," and the "Ikey," and all the other people that came in. See, Newfoundland wasn't a part of Canada then--they weren't Canadian. Even yet, you hear that once in awhile, you know--"Well, what do you expect of a Newfie?" They laugh at the Cape Bretoners, but they laugh a little bit more at the Newfoundlanders. (Now, the same man who started out peddling fish, raised his son....) To become a dentist. That's right. And two (of the daughters) were teachers and one was a nurse. And went to Montreal, of all places to take her--all by herself, went on the train. And never been out of the Pier in her life. So, they had somebody behind (them). I know my mother-in-law had been educated in St.
