John's. Taken out of the little port-- which was a fortune--and sent through school there. So she was more highly educated than her husband was. But he was not going to be left behind. Because, when the children went to school, he sat down and did all their lessons as if he was going to school, too. My husband used to say, "And he passed me," he said, "on mental arithmetic, and all these other things." I came from (a family of) four, too. Now, my father--his father died very (young), when he was only 30-some. And they were on one of these poor farms out in Round Island, if you know where Round Island is. Out around Mira. It'd be between Morien and Mira if you went the coast road. Homeville-- just along there. And it was poor and that. But they had the sea, too, so they could fish. They made a living, but it was pretty bad. But in front of the old home, Cottage Lane, Glace Bay. Back row, left to right: Euphonia & Warren Moffatt, Lila Reynolds, Harold Moffatt, Florence-- when he died, his widow and his children, ... /'. j..... .. j ra MacDonald, and Clara's parents Clara and William MacKinnon. Middle row: Clara's grandparents John T. & Agnes Moffatt, Frank Moffatt. Front: Mary MacKenzie, Hazel, and Frank's wife Jessie. they moved into Morien. And then there was Gowrie Mine there. In Morien. And the boys in the family were sent into the mine at 12. And my father, he was the second boy, so he went in at 12. And I guess--I don't know exactly--certainly, perhaps (when) he was 16. he might have been 17--but he said, "Enough of this." So he got on a schooner and he went to Boston. Now, of course--perhaps there were relatives there, I don't know. Because that was always the constant migration of people who wanted to get along a little better, would go to Boston. And there he learned his trade as a baker. But, as he got older--I suppose he must have been 25 or 26 when he came back.... (Clara, as a little girl, what were your plans?) All I can say about that is that was a very happy child, except when my mother got into politics.
