Have them sent here. The soldiers were brought to him. The King's son asked, "Did you kill my wife?" "No, we were not able to kill her. We put her in exile. Your mother had ordered us to kill her, but we didn't. With both her babies, we put them in exile in the forest." "Well then," the King's son said, "it's possible they're still living." He started to search from place to place, country to country, to find his wife. It just happened that he went to the hotel where she was staying. He asked the manager if there was a woman staying there with both her arms cut off and two babies that would be about three years old. The manager replied, "Yes, there is a woman here with two babies about three years old, but she has both her arms." The King's son answered, "Well then, it's not her. But in any case, could I see her?" He said, "Yes." The manager went to show him the woman • 'but it was the portrait of his wife. She did not want to be recognized by him for fear he would have her killed. The King's son returned to spend the night at another hotel. He dreamed that he should return to the hotel the next morning as it was really his wife staying there. She saw him coming. She said to her two sons (who were talking now; they were three), "Quick, Papa is coming. If he comes into this room, you should both say together, 'Good day, Papa.'" Acadian storyteller Marcellin Hache and his wife. Mr. Hache and Loubie Chiasson are the two storytellers featured in The Seven-Headed Beast and Other Acadian Tales. The father of the boys knocked on the door and entered. She said, "Good day," and he replied, "Good day to you." "Good day, Papa," the boys cried. The father asked, "Why are these children calling me Papa?" She said, "You can't deny it. They're the picture of you." > 2 FINE LOCATIONS • Handcrafts" Water Colours by KENNY BOONE 7535 Main Street, LOUISBOURG (LEWIS & CO. BLDG.) 733-2326 • r. j. 'y.
