shot him. As he fell, he was wearing glasses, the glasses fell off and broke. After we knew he got killed, my mother, well, she cried, and then she just went, like, frozen, completely. She said, "All I want to do is find his body and bury him." And, of course, that's a Jewish custom, to bring him to rest. Things that come right now to my mind that I remember is my aunt--my father's sister --came over. She said, "Let's go look. See if we can find him." But the bodies were already starting to decay. In July it was hot, and flies. So we went to a barber? shop- -they had a lot of cologne and other things--and we took some of it. The smell was so bad, the stench of the dead bodies. They were looking and...they finally found the place. And there was a Ukrainian policeman guarding it--for whatever reason I don't know--but they were staying, watching all those graves so people wouldn't take pictures or.... My mother spoke very good Ukrainian, and she spoke to that Ukrainian policeman. She said, "Look, my husband lays in that. I'd like to bury him. Would you let me take his body?" At this time, you know, they were wearing those pocket watches on the chain--and my father had a pocket watch with a chain. And he had a ring...whatever. Anna and Richie Blufarb, after World War Two. "I'll let you have the watch and the ring, just let me take the body." He said, "You come back when it starts to be dark" --you know, when the Germans go back to the barracks or whatever--"and I'll let you take out the body." BUS. 625-5135 FAX 6253851 ,, HOME 787-2988
