dock. Minister of Labour, 'informs an astonished people he has not the slightest doubt but that the forwarding of the troops to Cape Breton was to say the least premature, and he would do every? thing in his power to have the soldiers removed with all possible despatch." Emmerson Campbell; And the provincial police came down from Halifax. They were drunk all the time. They had 15 horses when they left Halifax and they put them in the boxcar and when they got in Sydney they were all dead. Smothered. Then they had to go and get some of the coal-haulers' horses here. But they were drunk all the time they were here. I guess to get the job you had to be a drunk. They had batons about k feet long, made right here in the steel plant. Strapped on their wrists just like a wrist watch. And they were swinging them. Good hardwood in them. They were made right down here in the plant in the carpenter shop. I knew a fellow right down here was making them. He didn't know what the hell he was making or who he was making them for, Doane Curtis; After they took over coal-haulers' horses, the first raid the provincial police made was on the city warehouse where they kept the stuff to cheer us. And after that they went up to the city hall and were told by Col. MacDonald he was going to "put on a show" that evening. (That the strikers were to be deliberately "aggravated," and that MacDonald was then going to have the provincial police "put on a show" was sworn to before a Royal Commission by a sergeant of the Sydney city police force.) They galloped down to Whitney Pier, past k gate and on the main street of Whitney Pier with their gallant army and their well-lit army, because that's what they were. With four-foot batons. And they went up and down the street hitting people on the sidewalk. Some of them were coming from church. They even hit a man was just out of the hospital and crippled with his wife leading him around the streets. Hit him on the head, split his head open. Then they went to the Atlantic House (a hotel), and passing the Atlantic House, a fellow jumped up there and the proprietor sitting on the verandah who was an invalid • they jammed him up against the building, hit his brother-in-law over the head. And the marks of the horses' shoes was on that verandah for years. Bernie Galloway. Sr.; After we were married • we were married one day and the strike came off the next • we stayed at my mother-in-law's a week or so. And Sunday evening (July 1) we went to church • the Polish church. And after we came out of church, we came down Victoria Road and when we got down where we lived • we lived right by the subway that used to separate this side from the Pier (the overpass today) • when we got there we decided to just keep on walking. So when we got by the railroad we saw this bunch of horses coming. Men on horseback • provincial police • with sticks, something like a baseball bat, I don't know how many there were. They lined up, they were coming down Victoria Road going towards the Pier. They were this side of the Pier. They got past us and her brother and his wife were behind us. And when we turned around to look, they were jumping over the fence. Mrs. Galloway; Those thugs were swinging those billies, you know, hitting the people. Beautiful Sunday evening after church and crowds of people walking, as we were doing. Beautiful
